What are the best locks for storage units?

When looking for the best locks for storage units, consider the three main types: padlocks, disc locks, and cylinder locks.

Are cylinder locks a good choice for storage units?

Padlocks are popular because they're easy to find and affordable, but it's important to have reinforcements on hand to ensure maximum security. That said, cylinder locks are the most common option offered by storage units. They're difficult to pick or otherwise force entry, but not as secure as disc locks or padlocks.

Are cylinder locks more secure than padlocks?

Cylinder locks are more secure than padlocks or disc locks because the lock mechanism is housed inside the storage unit. Since the cylinder lock for storage unit doors must be compatible with the lock mechanism, storage facilities that use this type of lock require their tenants to buy one directly from them when they rent the unit. Padlocks

Do storage units need a padlock or disc lock?

Storage units located in areas with higher crime or that have doors that are accessible from the outside are more susceptible to thieves and therefore require a padlock or disc lock that can provide a higher level of security. Shrouded or Exposed Shackle Padlocks and disc locks come in both shrouded and exposed shackle varieties.

Do storage units need a lock?

And while storage units might be a great solution for reducing clutter in the home, they require a good lock to ensure those belongings stay secure. Though many storage unit facilities require tenants to use a cylinder lock that the company provides, some leave it up to their tenants to provide their own lock.

Can you use a combination lock on a storage unit?

You can use a combination lock on a storage unit, but it isn't recommended. Standard combination locks tend to be less durable and easier to cut with bolt cutters. If you want a combination lock, be sure to get a disc lock or heavy-duty padlock that offers a combination option. What is a disc lock for a storage unit?
